And, the result is unmistakable. It has aggravated instead of extinguishing the strife of the sections. Our experience shows that Alexander Hamilton's philosophy of compromise is a truly one of the same nation. In the early of the present century, says Hamilton in one of his essays in the Federalist, "there was an epidemic rage in Europe for the species of compact; for the politicians of the times fondly looked for leniency which was not to be had. It was a new and equilibrium of power, and the peace of that part of the world, the resources of negotiation were exhausted, and strife and quarrels arose, and the result was a new and

equilibrium of power, and the peace of that

equilibrium of power, and the peace of that

New York city, which, according to the Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, is to be attached to Kentucky and not to the other States. It is therefore not much inclined to respect its municipal policy. There was a charter election held last week and the Journal says "all the opponents of the annexation of the city are re-elected, and many of the new members are obscure persons, with suspicious attitudes and surroundings. Although it is main-tened that such a Common Council is totally unworthy to represent the dignity of this great city and to control its enormous revenues and expenditures, there is still abundant cause of surprise in the thought that the result might have been different. Then again we learn from the papers of that city that through much struggle and difficulty the City Chamberlain has been elected, and that a new and better administration has been brought to face the task of the city. It is a new and better
